THE STORY BEHIND O'HEARN'S JONATHAN CLARKE COLLECTION

JONATHAN CLARKE kept store at a little country crossroads that became the crossroads of New England for a time, when the great waves of travel to the West began.

When the Republic was young, he was a young merchant already well established. He dealt in spices and rum, fine fabrics and household wares trundled inland by oxcart from the seaports; he dealt in eggs and mutton, rawhides and grain produced by his neighbors. And he dealt in furniture.

Furniture was his weakness and his pride. Although a shrewd man of affairs, he loved to work in wood and he cherished the fine woodwork of others. Over the years, he traded in furniture wrought by the men of the countryside in the long winter evenings—"distress" goods, some of them, sold to pay debts; "vanity" pieces made for the joy of it, and sold with reluctance; or "special orders" from the finer houses that could afford to purchase "boughten" goods.

In modern parlance, JONATHAN CLARKE became a sort of "manual arts teacher", coaching men and boys who worked with his tools in his cozy shop at odd hours, during slack times in the farmer's cycle of the year. Some of the tools they used in that shop were of Clarke's own design, or adaptations of old designs he shaped more efficiently. Many of the grace notes and characteristic innovations they wrought into the furniture their cunning hands brought to perfection were of Clarke's inspiration, too.

JONATHAN CLARKE'S barn became a storehouse of Early Americana that today would be beyond price. No doubt, there was always some dickering in process for this piece or that; but it is known that those pieces he esteemed most were not for sale in his lifetime.

Then, as America began to move westward, the JONATHAN CLARKE Collection began to break up. On the highroad past his store, where formerly only the daily stagecoach had enlivened the scant traffic of farm carts, the emigrant wagons plodded by dozens, then literally hundreds.

And JONATHAN CLARKE'S barn was a place to trade in your furniture for staples to see you on your way to York State and the mountains and beyond; or, just as often, to trade for nostalgic pieces of home to carry safely to the new towns in the midlands, or beyond the Great River to the Plains.

Even after Clarke himself was gone, the Collection served as an exchange from which items of his Collection moved out beyond the Hudson toward Missouri, toward Oregon, later toward Utah in the Mormon Trek. His finest pieces, those he had withheld from sale, went, too—some of them, as is known now, round the Horn to California.

At this late date, the O'Hearn brothers are diligently tracing the basic pieces of the JONATHAN CLARKE Collection. Wherever the westbound wagon trains made their way, these unique items of Americana may be found. And they are identified and brought home to New England, where the Collection is being reassembled, and choice specimens recreated by O'Hearn craftsmanship that his latterday admirers are confident JONATHAN CLARKE would approve.
